

UT-38/130 Main Battle Repulsortank

The Commonwealth soldier of the middle years during the Commonwealth Sector War had much to be proud of. Imperial forces had been driven back in a two-year-long retreat that was constantly under pressure from Commonwealth tank units, mainly equipped with UT-38/125s.

A large operation to try and entrap an immense Imperial tank force in the northern sector of the planet Drakos required a special repulsortank to spearhead the operation. By the latter stages of the war, the Empire began to equip its armored forces with the fast and well-armed Lynx tanks and the superlative, unmatched Lion repulsortanks. Commonwealth forces needed to stay on top of the Empire, and a new UT-38 design was sent to the drawing boards.

The Tyn'lk Corporation once again produced a runaway success in creating the UT-38/130. Incorporating a new metal alloy that was lighter than any other at the time, yet still as durable as standard steel plating, the UT-38/130 was hoped to be produced in large numbers by the Commonwealth High Command.

The UT-38/130 is equipped with a 130mm cannon, a slightly larger calibre gun than that of the Empire's Lynx repulsortank. A slight upgrade in armor from the UT-38/125 included the addition of armor skirts, or plates of steel bolted onto the sides of the tank to minimize the effects of hollow- and shaped-charge weapons. The UT-38/130 is also fitted with a concussion grenade launcher, a weapon that allows the tank to overrun enemy infantry positions without having to use the main gun's expensive ammunition.

Unfortunately for the Commonwealth Army, the Empire managed to capture a vital Tyn'lk production facility on Drakos before the UT-38/130 was able to be produced in mass numbers. The war ended a few years afterward when the Empire captured the capital city of Drakosia, leaving behind a long line of dead soldiers and destroyed vehicles, and a legacy of infamy of the UT-38 tank series.
