He was the oldest of three children in a family that had little money but still managed to get by. Matthew's father encouraged his son, who demonstrated excellent piloting abilities when he was very young, to join the Imperial Navy. At age 17 Matthew got on the shuttle for Carida and spent four grueling years enduring rigorous Imperial training. When he was 21, he graduated and was assigned to a Victory Class Star Destroyer as a TIE fighter pilot. Eventually Matthew realized that the Empire just wasn't for him. They were too rigid. He wanted to entureoff on his own. He managed to beat the odds and escape the Star Destroyer in a stolen TIE scout. But Matthew still had a dream. That dream was fame. He wanted the galaxy to know and respect the name "Dagger". He took on some odd jobs and earned the money to soup up his stolen TIE. He met other independent fighter pilots. He eventually formed a pirate squadron. The group went on a few runs. They destroyed a pirate corvette harassing a defenseless system, they stole Imperial weapons and ship parts, and they built a secret hangar on an asteroid which served as a small base. The squadron never became famous, much to the dismay of Matthew. Their asteroid hideout was located and destroyed by Imperial officials. Though none of the squadrons pilots were hurt, all of their ships were destroyed. The squadron disbanded. Matthew got a job as a security officer aboard a neutral space station in the Outer Rim at about the same time as the destruction of Alderaan. When the Empire came to the station and threatened to take it for themselves, Matthew helped lead the evacuation of the station and the crew eventully located an Alliance corvette. For the next few weeks Matthew has been training young Rebel pilots. He was very recently given the rank of Commander and the command of Liberty Squadron.
Objectives: Fame. Hurt the Empire.
