Background on the Nanjin Adept

The son of a small-time boxer, Matt Murdock was taught by his father that fighting was not the answer to life's problems. A poorly educated but noble man, Battlin' Jack Murdock encouraged his son to achieve great things with his mind, rather than his fists. Idolizing his father, Matt took the advice to heart. As a result, his fellow students mockingly dubbed the introverted bookworm "Daredevil." Humiliated, Matt began training without his father's knowledge so he could stand up to the bullies in school.

As raised by his father, Matt was selflessly noble. This was never more apparent than when he pushed an elderly man out of the path of a runaway truck. Matt's kindness was cruelly repaid by fate when radioactive waste from the vehicle's payload splashed onto his eyes, blinding him. Devastated at first by his apparent handicap, Matt slowly came to realize that the accident had radically augmented his ability to perceive the world around him. His vision was gone, but the radioactivity had heightened his other senses to a superhuman degree.

Unable to adjust to his overdeveloped senses, the terrified Matt eventually came under the tutelage of the blind martial-arts master Stick. A stern, unrelenting taskmaster, Stick educated Matt in both the spiritual and physical aspects of the martial arts, refusing to let him think of himself as a helpless victim. Matt emerged as an Olympic-class gymnast and formidable hand-to-hand combatant.

As a student at Columbia University Law School, Matt met and fell in love with Elektra Natchios, the daughter of a Greek diplomat. Their happiness was shattered when Elektra's father died during a hostage crisis. Elektra withdrew emotionally from both Matt and the world at large. Fleeing to the Far East, she buried her feelings and honed her fighting skills to razor-sharp perfection.

The loss of Elektra wasn't the only pain Matt would suffer during his college years. Past his prime as a fighter, Jack Murdock had fallen in with a shady crowd and was ultimately murdered for refusing to throw a fight. Not satisfied with the police investigation, Matt hid his identity beneath a mask and took it upon himself to track down the criminals who had set up and murdered his father. Taking the name Daredevil, he brought those responsible to justice.

Finding satisfaction and release in his extracurricular activities, Matt adopted the costumed identity on a permanent basis. During the day, he worked within the judicial system, aided by college roommate and fellow attorney Foggy Nelson. But at night, freed from the constraints of the courtroom, Matt pursued those criminals who had slipped through the system's cracks. For a time, he knew happiness as Daredevil, living out his fantasies as a swashbuckling crimefighter.

But Daredevil's efforts to undermine New York's crime infrastructure attracted the attention of the Kingpin, who made it his personal mission to destroy the hero. Hiring Elektra as his chief assassin, the Kingpin set in motion a chain of events that led to her death at the hands of Bullseye. Although she later returned to life, Elektra's murder nearly crippled Matt emotionally—touching off a vicious cycle of violence, loss and pain.

Roleplaying the Nanjin Adept

He dwells in a world of eternal night, but the blackness is filled with sounds and scents, tastes and textures most men cannot perceive. Although attorney Matt Murdock is blind, his other four senses function with superhuman sharpness. He stalks the streets at night, a relentless avenger of justice: Daredevil, the Man Without Fear!
